DANGEROUS LANDSCAPES — RE-THINKING ENVIRONMENTAL RISK IN LOW-INCOME COM- MUNITIES

Climate change and rapid urbanization will expose more and more humans around the globe to natural hazards. Future informal urbanization activities in dangerous terrain will increase overall vulnerabilities especially for flooding and landslides in the fast growing regions of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Peri-urban and rural settlements will also face increased risks such as the intensification of droughts. Therefore, developing integrated risk reduction strategies in such regions will be one of the great challenges of the future. The Herrenhausen Conference “Dangerous Landscapes” will specifically examine trans-disciplinary, community-based and emerging approaches to disaster risk reduction in low-income communities. The conference will address integrative and affordable forms of prevention and counteractions that could be part of everyday life of threatened low-income communities. Given the massive increase expected in urbanization, prevention and response efforts are likely to overwhelm state agencies, aid organizations, and residents in the coming years.

A broad array of experts from various disciplines is invited to join the conference, including researchers and practitioners of landscape and urban design, the humanities, the engineering sciences, as well as those involved in community-based organizations. The inputs will range from promising ideas to realized projects. Potentials of scalar applicability, bottom-up and top-down overlays, as well as linkages between high and low technologies will be explored. The collection of these contributions shall contribute to an ever-evolving taxonomy for disaster preparation in low-income communities.

“Dangerous Landscapes” is part of the Herrenhausen Conference Series initiated by the Volkswagen Foundation. The conference establishes a further link to a series of conferences initiated by the Informal Urbanism Hub as part of the UN-Habitat University Initiative (UNI). We invite all researchers and experts working in this field. There is no fee for the attendance, but registration is essential.
